VERA CRUZ, April 25 .- A sigh of relief was offered by every American at Vera Cruz last night when the train bringing Charge Nelson O'Shaughnessy with his wife and child, and the last lot of refugees from Mexico City pulled into the railroad yard guarded by American marines.

The train was long overdue and the ugliest rumors had been afloat. The experiences of the passengers on the preceding trains | Major Freyermuth Tells Memwhich had came through under British protection and flying the British flag, had not all been reassuring.

The whereabouts of O'Shaughnessy had been unknown. It had even been reported that he was not on the train, but that he had gone to a port on the west coast to embark there because of the threats that had been made against him should he attempt to come through by Vera Cruz.

All of the refugees who have come in tell thrilling stories of their to be outdone by other cities in this cruiser Progresso which was turned experiences in the anti-American demonstrations that took place in Mexico City when the news of the capture of Vera Cruz was pub-
