THE GREAT WEST. From Denver (Colo.) Post. Is it any wonder that prophets are without honor in their own land? "In estimating the useful soil in America, we reject... a belt of barren land about 300 miles broad by 1000 in length, or 300,000 square miles, lying on the east side of the Rocky mountains." American Encyclopedia Britannica, 1890 Edition. In that "belt of barren land" there are now more than 7,000,000 people, and the percentages of increase of population of the states in that belt in the past 10 years have ranged from 45 to 105. Maps of the United States published in 1825, copies of which are in the Post Library, showed Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, the Dakotas, part of Nebraska, part of Kansas and adjacent territory as the "Great American Desert." No section of the Union has shown more rapid growth in the last decade. The same maps indicated California as "unexplored territory," and did not show any settlement in what is now the state of Washington. California in 10 years has leaped from 31st to 12th in rank among the states of the Union, now having a population nearly as great as that of the 13 original colonies when the United States constitution was adopted; and Washington has shown greater percentage of gain in population in the last 10 years than any other state or territory. Married Life the Second Year Mabel Herbert Urner On The Broken Promise

THE novelty of the baby was wearing away. Warren no longer hurried home every afternoon as he had in the first few weeks. He was again drifting back into the habit of stopping at the club on his way from the office and of spending an occasional evening out. And to Helen was coming another phase of the realization that nothing can last, that no condition of things between two people can remain permanent, that in married life there is no stage that can be reached where one can say, "Now, this will last; this is permanent." There is always a subtle shifting, an everchanging underlying in their attitude toward each other. Helen had thought the child would be a bond upon which they could anchor their permanent harmony and happiness. And now she was bewildered to find that it was not so. Many of the difficulties, the discords, the neglect that had confronted her before the coming of the baby were now beginning to confront her again. It was one dismal, rainy afternoon that he telephoned he would not be home for dinner; that an old college chum was in town and wanted him to dine at the club. With a heavy heart Helen hung up the receiver. Last week he had spent two evenings downtown, and this was only Tuesday, and he was ditting out again. Was it to be again as it was before the baby came? Was he to spend most of his evenings away from home? And would he soon be coming in after midnight, flushed with wine? That had not happened yet. He had given her a promise at the birth of the baby that he would never drink again. And, so far, she felt he had kept his word. But, somehow, this evening she was filled with dread. He was drifting back to his old habits in so many ways. How could she be sure that it would not be in all ways? She had her dinner alone, then bathed the baby and put her to sleep, straightened up the nursery and finally got out her work basket and sat down to sew. But the sewing occupied only her hands. Her mind was full of Warren, and of an indefinite dread of the future. At 9 she began watching the clock. She knew it was foolish to expect him so early, and yet she found herself listening for every sound. At 10 she laid aside her sewing and took up a magazine. If she could only interest herself in a story, she would not seem so long. But she could not hold her attention to the words about her. She read a whole page without knowing what it was about. She almost wished the baby would awaken—anything to occupy her time and attention. At 11 she resolved to go to bed. She knew that it would only irritate him to find her waiting up for him so late.

But she could not sleep. She tossed and turned for almost an hour, then she could stand it no longer. Slipping into a heavy bathrobe, she went into the front room and sat down by the window. It was raining heavily. The streets were deserted, save for now and then a dark umbrella-hidden figure hurrying by. Each time her heart leapt with the hope that it might be Warren, but always the figure passed on. The Fear of Drink. The sitting room clock struck 1. She went back and threw herself down on the bed in sick despair. She knew now that the fear which had haunted her all evening was true—he was rinking! Nothing else would have kept him so late! It was almost 2 when she heard the hall door open. She did not move. She thought it would be easier to pretend she was asleep. She hadn't the heart or the courage to talk to him now. And besides, it would not help, anything she could say would only irritate and excite him. She heard him moving around the sitting room—then in his own room. The door between was ajar—would he open it to see if she was asleep? She lay quite still, her face turned away, but he did not come to the door. He was undressing now. She waited for the sound of running water in the bathroom. However late he came home, he always took his bath. But tonight he didn't. There was a creaking of springs as he threw himself heavily into bed. For a long time she lay staring into the darkness before her. Perhaps, after all, she was wrong. Something might have detained him. He might not have broken his promise, he might not have been drinking at all. The Promise Broken. She sprang up, her heart beating fast. She must know! It was not far for him to harbor even a doubt—when it might be groundless! She stole quietly into the hall—open door. From his heavy breathing she knew he was asleep. Very softly she entered the room. The rain had ceased and a bright moonlight shone through the window. He was lying like a child, his arms thrown up over the pillow. His face was turned towards her; it was not flushed, there was nothing about him to suggest that he had been drinking. Instead, he looked very strong and virile there, his well-built form outlined by the covers, and yet with a face almost boyishly sweet in its repose. With a sudden rush of tenderness she drew nearer the bed. And she had been wrong! She felt sure of it now. An immeasurable joy and relief swept through her. She stooped over to kiss him—not to awaken him—just to kiss the covers or perhaps his arm. And then she started sharply! The odor of wine, of alcohol, was unmistakable! For a moment she stood motionless, gazing down at him. Then she turned and crept silent back to her bed.

Was it to be again as it was before the baby came? Was he to spend most of his evenings away from home? And would he soon be coming in after midnight, flushed with wine? That had not happened yet. NEGOTIATE SALE OF MINE CLAIMS. Bisbee, Ariz., Dec. 14.—James Letson, Peter Johnson and Morris Denn are negotiating with eastern capitalists for the sale of a group of claims south of Bisbee. It is expected the deal will be closed about the first of the year. The pumping of water from the Denn shaft is progressing rapidly and there are now only a little over 90 feet to be pumped. A force of about 40 men is to be put on after the Bisbee-Extension mine soon after the first of the year, and with the new water, the mine has been sent to the camp for the rebuilding of the tent house recently destroyed by fire. A large compressor will likely be installed at once. OPERATOR WIRES FOR HELP WHILE HE IS BEING HELD UP. Men of Key Seventy Miles Away Telegraphs Alarm Best Robber. Escapes Posses. A moment later Gleisner called up Cornwall, nearest West Shore Station to Highland, and Poughkeepsie, just across the Hudson from Highland, and gave the alarm. He then called Highland. Brigham Young, who before his death, was the recognized leader of the Mormons in Utah, and the design on the silver service which is to be presented by that state to the battleship Utah. The design, the principal feature of which is a figure of Young, has been the occasion of thousands of protests from citizens of Utah, who contributed to the fund that was raised to buy the silver service. The opponents of the design say that it will be a national disgrace if the officers of the new battleship accept a silver service carrying the figure of a man who was for years in open defiance of the federal government and who practiced and promoted the cause of polygamy all his life. It is claimed that the design was selected secretly by a Mormon committee. A country wide public protest is being made and prominent preachers everywhere are denouncing the proposed gift. The design is merely a street scene in Salt Lake, showing the Young statue and the Mormon temple.
