Kaiser's palace now a movie studio. Where once the "supreme war lord" was wont to pace the marble floor and await news of "victories," actors and actresses of the photoplay world are filming "The Life of Frederick the Great." Even the cradle of the Hohenzollerns, 200 years old, has been leased for the moving picture.

W. Brooke Johns of Washington plays the banjo on the sands of Palm Beach, while Mrs. Sava Kehaya of New York dances.

Mrs. Edith Root, Jr., of New York assists the artist, Charles B. Falls, in preparing decorations for the beaux arts ball, one of the artistic features of the social season in the metropolis. A number of well known artists and sculptors contribute their work for the occasion.

Jack Hurdleston, who knows a thing or two about the ancient game of golf, gives a few pointers to Constance Talmadge, movie star. "But," says Jack, "this parlor variety of the game has its drawbacks!"

At one time, not so very long ago, he was military governor of Moscow, and he was known far and wide in Russia as Maj. Gen. Theodore Lodijensky. Now he is simply Theodore Lodijensky, and he works as a waiter in a Russian restaurant in New York.

President Harding sends his photograph to a New York girl, Miss Pauline Henkel, who sold $3,300,000 worth of Liberty bonds during the war. Miss Henkel is sixteen years old and has received many medals. She is also an honorary colonel in the United States Army.
