Jurors Shout Their Verdict. The jury did not wait for their foreman to speak. Every man of them shouted "Guilty," and some repeated the cry,

"Guilty, guilty, guilty." Beattie had stood up on demand of the clerk to face the jury when it was rendering its verdict. In one swift, wild look he expressed the agony that had struck in upon him. But the next instant he had braced himself and determined to take the verdict smilingly. It was a weird flicker of a smile, more painful to see than would have been his tears. A curious thing happened-such a thing as a dramatist might have devised as an with the care we took we had an un- effective "piece of business."
