The U-Boat Terror Crawls to Our Doorstep.
The German Undersea Raider U-53 and Some of the Effects of Her Atlantic Steamer Lane Marauding.

Survivors of the Stephano on the steps of the Navy Training Hospital, Newport. They were picked up in boats by the United States destroyers Eversman and Balch.

The U-53 at anchor in Newport. Scarcely more than twenty-four hours after her hurried departure from an American harbor the submarine stopped and sank six British and neutral ships.

A pity-impelling group consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Richard Driscoll and their baby boys. Photographed on their arrival at Grand Central Station.

The crew of the Stephano, photographed upon being landed at Newport by destroyers of the United States Navy, which did splendid rescue work.

Officers of the raider observed naval etiquette. Captain Hans Ross, Lieutenant S. Steen and Lieutenant C. Muller on the deck of the U.53 in conversation with an American naval officer.

The U-Boat Terror Crawls to Our Doorstep.
The German Undersea Raider U-53 and Some of the Effects of Her Atlantic Steamer Lane Marauding.

Survivors of the Stephano on the steps of the Navy Training Hospital, Newport. They were picked up in boats by the United States destroyers Eversman and Balch.

The U-53 at anchor in Newport. Scarcely more than twenty-four hours after her hurried departure from an American harbor the submarine stopped and sunk six British and neutral ships.

A pity-impelling group consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Richard Driscoll and their baby boys. Photographed on their arrival at Grand Central Station.

The crew of the Stephano, photographed upon being landed at Newport by destroyers of the United States Navy, which did splendid rescue work.

Officers of the raider observed naval etiquette. Captain Hans Ross, Lieutenant S. Steen and Lieutenant C. Muller on the deck of the U.53 in conversation with an American naval officer.